This lesson on Early Dementia includes a complete training packet. Each in-service packet takes approximately one hour to complete and fully meets the Medicare in-service training requirements. As aides need training, you can make as many copies as you want - there s no restriction when used with aides assigned from your office location. Remember that Home Health Aides must have 12 hours of in-service training every year. LESSON OBJECTIVES Upon completion of this program, the home health aide will be able to: Identify three types of conditions that appear to be dementia, but are treatable Describe three early signs and/or symptoms of dementia, and Explain three strategies to use when caring for a patient with early dementia. OVERVIEW Dementia is a progressive brain disorder, which results in the inability to care for oneself. Many diseases and/or injuries result in dementia, the most common being Alzheimer s disease. Today, our society has a longer lifespan than past generations. This, along with the fact that dementia appears later in life and the number of baby-boomers reaching retirement age is increasing, results in a rapid increase of seniors who require care for dementia. People obtain dementia through genetics, trauma, infection, and poor diet. Although, many times the reason is never identified. Some forms of dementia are curable, while most are not. Each type of dementia has its own set of signs and symptoms, which uniquely affect the brain. All people progress differently through the stages. This in-service focuses on the early stage of dementia. Home health aides are front-line caregivers for the elderly in the home setting, and may be the first to see these signs and symptoms as they appear, or be assigned to care for a newly diagnosed dementia patient. Therefore, they will be in the home when the patient and family are adjusting to the new needs of the patient.
