The two essays in the volume turn to Art's domain as a source of inspiration and instruction for the construction of its concepts and the development of its problems. The first essay addresses the encounter of Gérard Titus-Carmel with Grünewald's famous altar piece, Crucifixion, in 159+1 variations, which take a musical form, or rather, whose form becomes musical; the second stages an encounter between the writings of Jean-Luc Nancy that patiently trace the interstices, gaps, and hollows that constitute "bodies" and the cinema of Claire Denis that invents an intensely sensuous relation to bodies it projects into the screen.
