iGuerilla: Reshaping the Face of War in the 21st Century, is a book in the tradition of Thomas Paine in Common Sense and Winston Churchill in The Gathering Storm. Like Paine, author John Sutherland alerts those in the large populace of the United States and Western Europe who have yet to see the big picture of international war that is underway. And like Churchill, he traces the trails of war to the present to bring an understanding of the changing nature of war and those who conduct it. And why they conduct it. iGuerilla: Reshaping the Face of War in the 21st Century, projects the future and delves into the manner in which the future will unveil. It is an illustration of how the war of the very near future will be conducted, driven by an enemy conducting a war of conquest in which it intends to subject its hated enemy, the United States and the West, to a humiliating and ignominious subjection. iGuerilla: Reshaping the Face of War in the 21st Century, projects the future and delves into the manner in which the future will unveil. It is an illustration of how the war of the very near future will be conducted, driven by an enemy conducting a war of conquest in which it intends to subject its hated enemy, the United States and the West, to a humiliating and ignominious subjection. John Sutherland believes it is time to reverse that intent. He outlines the strategy and tactics necessary to deliver a large crushing defeat to the jihad movement in order to return it to the prolonged quietude to which it has historically dwelled after each crushing defeat it has suffered since 732 AD when Western armies led by Charles Martel at Tours soundly defeated the Umayyad Caliphate and an army of Spanish Moors.
